Carly Fiorina shattered a glass ceiling when she was named CEO of Hewlett-Packard in 1999—becoming the first woman ever to lead a Fortune 20 company. Inspired to enter politics because of her belief in limitless human potential and her desire to fight government bureaucracy, Fiorina ran against Democratic incumbent California Senator Barbara Boxer in 2009, challenging Boxer’s support for abortion and the Affordable Health Care Act. In 2015, Fiorina announced her bid for the Republican presidential nomination, the only woman in the 17-contender field. During the campaign, Fiorina forcefully called out Democratic candidate Hillary Clinton’s abortion extremism and exposed to a live national audience the grisly reality of Planned Parenthood’s fetal parts’ business, as revealed in the undercover videos obtained by the Center for Medical Progress. Now living in Virginia with her family, Fiorina continues to work to elect conservative candidates and reform Washington.
